

worse than a harlot gone righteous, and they hit the ceiling, and they wanted the town fathers to make Judge Roy Bean apologize. So he said, well, ladies, I apologize but I didn't call you whores, I didn't call you prostitutes, and he went down the whole list of what he was letting them know that he thought they were, so the apology was worse than the first statement that he made. Well, while he was trying to get started this guy named Bad Bob came into his town and Bad Bob had everybody in terror. He had hair as white as Senator Jensen's but it was longer than anybody's in here, including our lady colleagues. And Bad Bob came in and he was hyperactive and some fellow was heating some hot coffee on a campfire and Bad Bob picked up a big raw onion, bit into that onion and drank that hot coffee right from the spout, and his trigger finger was itchy and his whole hand was shaking because he was looking for Judge Roy Bean, then suddenly a shot rang out, a hole went through Bad Bob's back, big enough to put both fists through. And where was Judge Roy Bean? Hiding up in the hayloft with a rifle and shot Bad Bob in the back. And all these other people, even though they were afraid of him, came to Judge Roy Bean and they said, Judge, that wasn't fair, you didn't give Bad Bob a chance. He said, if he wanted a chance, he shouldn't have come to my town. So if I want a chance, I can't go by your rules, I've got to be smarter than that.

PRESIDENT ROPAK: One minute.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Here's what I'm getting to though. And I didn't mind taking my whole five minutes on this because I've got to get this out. A young guy, played by Roddy McDowell, came to town and he brought law books and he was going to show Judge Roy Bean where all this land and these other things that the judge had accumulated and that interfered with what Roddy McDowell wanted to do was not according to the law. So Judge Roy Bean said, show me that law. Roddy McDowell pulled out his book, opened it up, he said, there it is, Judge. Roy Bean took that page and tore it out. He said, bad law. So it wasn't the law anymore. That's what the Chair does. That's what you all do. All I need to know is if we're playing by Judge Roy Bean's rules and I will out-Bean you.

PRESIDENT ROBAK: Thank you, Senator Chambers. Senator Dierks.

SENATOR DIERKS: Call the question.
