Medicaid program, as we are. What I found out since that time is that, not counting Nebraska, there are 17 states that are looking at Medicaid only as the expansion vehicle to deal with this matter. If you add Nebraska in, if we take that route, that'd be 18 out of the 50 states. So immediately you can...and that is the largest grouping of what states are moving toward at this point. The second largest grouping is Medicaid expansion in conjunction with some private insurance program or some, not necessarily private insurance program, some other entity that may have been in existence prior to that. So, right off the bat, you have 17 or 18 states that are just Medicaid, another 15 that are Medicaid in conjunction with something else, and what we have left that we can find out is something like 9 states that are supposedly not doing Medicaid. And out of those nine, at least a couple look like they are doing Medicaid, but they just call it something different, sort of like our Kids Connection will be called...this program, but it's really part of Medicaid. And so, it looks to me like just a handful of states are actually looking at the route of taking a private sector approach only, which gets back to the point of the sunset by Senator Brown. Most likely, most likely, even if we decide in a couple of years to make a change, it will still involve some role for Medicaid. So you set up the program with the bill this year, and it runs for two or three years, you're probably not going to have it drop off, as this sunset calls for, and start something up privately. You'll most likely, if you make any change at all, look at supplementing it with another alternative through the private sector. Why would you want to drop off the Medicaid aspect, then, through a sunset? The better route would be to allow the study to continue...to be done as is proposed and was adopted by this Legislature in two years. Then in three years, in the session in the year 2001, use the study as a basis to come in with proposals to make changes in the program, and that may include a wide range of changes. Who knows, after a couple of years we'll see what other states are doing. We'll see how it works here in Nebraska. We'll have more information, but you have the ability to make changes at that time. The problem with a sunset of July 1 of the year 2001 is you have a cliff effect. You have, shortly after the end of the session...not 90 days after the end of the session, but within a month or so of the end of the session, July 1 of 2001, the whole program goes away. So doubt
