added to the bill. It was another bill and it has to do...I hope you will open up the booklet to those pages. It has to do with optometrists and ophthalmologists and their relationship with mail order contact lens houses that may be located in state or may be located out of state. And I think that when you look at a bill like this, it's necessary to look at it from a couple of different perspectives. One is the perspective of what is good medical practice and what should be there to protect the public in terms of good practices. And the other perspective is the economic perspective and what is in or is not in this bill in terms of protecting consumers in the interplay between optometrists and ophthalmologists and the mail order contact lens houses that provide contact lenses at a lower price in many instances. And part of my interest in this particular bill comes from a personal experience. The last time that I went in to have my eyes checked and to get contact lenses, and when I ordered the contact lenses, I got them right there at the optometrist's office because it was convenient. But at the same time, I knew that within a month or two I would lose one of my contact lenses, I am not very good at keeping track of them, and that on down the line before very much more time had passed, I would lose another one and I would be ordering at least once or twice in the next year probably additional contact lenses. So I asked the assistant who was helping with the contact lenses there if I could have a copy of my prescription, and she said it was not the practice of the office to give a copy of the prescription. And, of course, I wanted the prescription because I was thinking about using these mail order houses who had the cheaper price, and you can't use them without your prescription. So I said that I thought I had a right to my prescription, and she replied that, no, that it was not the practice, the doctor didn't allow them to give out prescriptions, written prescriptions. And I had further conversation with her and further insisted that I should be able to get my prescription. Well, she eventually went back and asked the doctor, and the doctor said, sure, give him the written prescription. But by that time what lingered in my mind was, did I get the prescription because I was State Senator Chris Beutler, and would Chris Beutler's constituents, if they had walked into that office and asked for their written prescription, would they ever have gotten it? Secondly, how many of them would have known
