

March 5, 1990

arrogance that was there, in this whole process, really offended me. And I guess I had kind of forgotten about that until I heard Senator Kristensen and Senator Dierks' responses. And I think that the real problem we have here is one of trust and one of lack of responsiveness to the people that are most directly affected by this process. There isn't a soul out there, I'm convinced, that has all the skills that are necessary to adequately please everybody in a process this difficult. But I think the need for respecting the public is absolutely paramount here. And I think that it's evident, abundantly clear that the public has lost confidence with this whole process, if they ever had any to begin with. And I suggest that we ought to send this back to committee to satisfy questions that have been raised here. And my own desire, personally, would be I want to know what's going to happen with this shared liability concern. As Senator Morrissey pointed out, there is no guarantee that anything is going to pass this session, or that that's going to be aggressively pursued in the compact. There are no guarantees at this point that communities are going to be treated any better, that any efforts are going to be made to heal the wounds there. And I think, as I reflect on the momentum that I see here for this confirmation, based on a legitimate respect for the man's credentials, I think we're just moving this train one more place down the track when we have the obligation, as legislators, to actively pursue the concerns that have been raised here. The process is simply not working at this point on those fronts. And I guess, as I thought about what I'm hearing today, this is the last chance, I think, that we have as legislators to satisfy our concerns. The buck has to stop somewhere, and it looks to me like the place for it to stop is right here in this Legislature, and for us to go back and ask these tough questions and demand some answers, because the answers have not been forthcoming. I have been concerned about this liability question from, I think it's documented from as far back as 1987. And I recall serving on that task force and the sense of frustration that emerged out of there from people who represented the cities, who represented the counties, who were ordinary citizens, that questions that they thought were legitimate were not getting answered. And so I really think that we, as legislators, have an opportunity here to ask those questions. And I think we have a person who is capable of answering those questions, certainly talented enough to ask those questions. But I think, if we just go ahead and vote to confirm today, without getting down in black and white some of these answers, that we will have not fulfilled our