

hold the highest positions in the church even though the one they worship has a woman for a mother, but I guess they say the one who created the mother was a male, Jehovah, and Jehovah is portrayed as being a male. But that is strange because if humans are created in that image, then that God must be a hermaphrodite because there are male and female that exist in this world. So which one was made in that image, the male or the female? Perhaps if women had the upper hand and were as chauvinistic in their own way as males have shown themselves to be, every pronoun referring to God would be feminine. The fact is that we're confronted not with just the issue of abortion and a woman's right to make that choice, we are confronted with the status and role of females in this society. That's what we're discussing as well as the issue of abortion. And you'll notice that there are women in the churches, there are women in the political parties, there are women in various organizations beginning to say that their femaleness is more important and essential than keeping faith with rules, dogmas and other statements manufactured by men for the purpose of subjugating women and they will not accept that position any longer. As a numerical majority in this country, they have got to start asserting their political power which they have in terms of their numbers, and in all of those states and all of those cities, in those national elections that are being contemplated, wherever it is shown that women are starting to rouse themselves and resort to political action, instead of whining and simpering and begging with hard-hearted men to do justice, those politicians who are seeking those votes are starting to find a way to accommodate the wishes of these women. They suddenly see that, hey, yeah, maybe a woman should have a right to make that choice. This is not a change in his or her principles, it's a change because of political expediency. The original rock hard position was a politically expedient position. The squeaking wheel gets the grease. So far those who have been against a woman's right to make a choice relative to an abortion have been making the most noise. They have played very skillfully upon the principle that if you are persistent and if you are loud, then you will frighten politicians because politicians in general are essentially uncourageous or noncourageous people. Well, as the tide begins to turn and the pendulum begins to swing, you're going to find politicians who formerly had taken these rock hard positions against a woman's right to choice suddenly saying, personally, I still am opposed to abortion, however, as a public official I don't have the right to impose my views on others, but that's not what they said when they
