

April 3, 1990

have not...I'm like Senator Schimek, I guess, in this regard. I have not decided at this point how I will vote on the motion. But I always enjoy listening to Senator Crosby. I think that in the last couple of years, in times when we're at each other's throats, Senator Crosby gets up and says, you know, we are adults and we should be able to sit down and reason with each other and not talk fiercely at each other, especially on issues like abortion. And I take a great deal of solace in what she says, because I think, if we had more people like Senator Crosby speaking firmly in quiet tones, maybe we would get more things done, and maybe we wouldn't be caught at the end of the session with this kind of problem. Obviously abortion is an extremely difficult issue, and it's a complex one. It's interesting, I was on a TV show the other night, and I was asked, by a caller, why can't...why must...or why can't we have parental notification for abortion when the question we're all asked about if a young girl cannot get her ears pierced without her parents' consent. And those are the kinds of questions that are asked of all of us, I know. And, obviously, the abortion issue is much, much more complex than that and involves constitutional rights that are extremely difficult to identify, first of all. And then once you identify those constitutional rights, try to figure out where they go in the large scheme of constitutional law as applied to day-to-day circumstances. And each particular type of law or statute we deal with in the abortion question creates a whole set of different constitutional questions, aside from the moral questions and the other questions that are raised. So it is an extremely complex issue, one that we, I'm sure, will be debating for the next ten years. And I wish, I guess in the four years I have been here, and I was telling this to someone in the lobby the other day how the thing that has been most disappointing to me is that we really, for one reason or another, haven't had the kind of debate on those issues that needs to be done, needs to be had. How far can we go as a Legislature? How far should we go? I remember when we started debating parental notification it wasn't until three days into the debate that we even acknowledged that there was an existing law on the books. I'll never forget that. We kept passing the law around and saying, here's the law, but we never debated it. And, my goodness, that's...we have a law on the books, there are constitutional problems with it, let's talk about it, let's deal with it rationally like rational human beings instead of just saying in very generalistic, moralistic tones we're going to do this or not do this. I hope that in the next session, if we have these abortion bills again, which I assume we will, we can 12641