absolutely no idea what they are there to do and are supposed to do and what they are supposed to enforce and study. That's the way it is. I'm sure that's the way it is on many councils. There's people we all know that don't take the time to do the job right and there's people that take the time and take their jobs very seriously. And the double standard that Senator Johnson mentioned is exactly what I'm talking about. The pressures on that gentlemen from the gas company will be very real unless they are the gold, the heart of gold corporation, concerned about the citizens of the State of Nebraska. Now this is a pipeline company now, mind you, a pipeline company who I don't think this particular pipeline company sued the State of Nebraska, but I think their parent corporation did sue the State of Nebraska. Now these are the corporate officers that we're going to be concerned that they won't put any undue pressure on one of their corporate members to act in a manner that would affect negatively the bottom line of their corporation because they will sit back and say, no, it's better for the citizens of Nebraska if you vote against our economic interest. Now this is what we're talking about. Now if we want to talk about conflict of interest, let's talk about it. There are some good corporations and there are some bad corporations just as there are good commissioners and bad commissioners, good senators and bad senators. And all of them said that quite honestly and this gentleman I believe owned his own business so he won't experience the pressures that the gentleman will, that works for the corporation, the pipeline company. Now the gentleman we did not move, Mr. Sommer, the conflict of interest that caused the concern, was a lawsuit that an organization he belonged to had against Ferrett Industries. And that lawsuit claimed, and rightfully so in my opinion, I believe if you want to do any study on it, that this was a wholly owned foreign company operating in the State of Nebraska. So this gentleman's conflict of interest was that he didn't think this corporation should...
