the university because that will just put the strain on the next year's budget when, in fact, they have to recoup it. This amount of strain put on the university or higher education is of the same nature, it's a little different accounting twist but it's literally the same nature basically of boosting the amount of contribution towards this budget cutting period to the universities by a little more money than what they...the 4.2 million, I think, as Senator Moore alluded to a little bit ago, it pops that up to a little more than 4.2, might, in essence, take it all the way up to 4.4. But I contend again that if, in fact, we reduce the benefits that were promised to these students and we reduce them very significantly, as is in the bill, that what you're going to find is the students are going to take less hours and so, therefore, the Cash Funds are going to drop off anyway. So the bottom line is the university is going to come back in next year asking for additional support because they're not generating the amount of credit hour production they would have otherwise because some of the students at the university has. The university and higher education loves these programs because it helps recruit students and gives them an impetus to go to school as well. They may not be in the higher educational system if it wasn't for these kinds of enticements. So it isn't just an enticement to get students into the National Guard, it's an enticement to keep students in the education. One of the strongest benefits I think we've heard in the testimony the other day was not only are these people enticed into our higher educational system and are proving themselves in that regard but there are also people who have made a commitment to Nebraska for six to eight years, in most cases, and in conjunction with that they are attending the university. They are, in many cases, working. They are probably more likely the candidates who will stay in Nebraska upon their degrees than probably the run of the mill university student who, in many cases, has no particular need or commitment to Nebraska, particularly if he's lured away at the end of graduation to go to another state for higher paying opportunities. So we're talking about people who are deeply entrenched in the Nebraska system and, therefore, there are several benefits that spin off from that as well. But the $500 cap is, like I say, kind of a strange twist to go with this process because we're dealing with percentages and then we turn around and put a...
