waiting for years and years and years for services, not able to access even the first level of care within the service system we have in place. And what we're suggesting for these individuals is at least they have a case manager to talk to them about their concerns, to talk about their situation, to talk about their needs and to identify maybe some existing sources that may be available to help them and also to identify for us as policymakers and the different regions to know what the need level is and the focus and priorities that need to be addressed to the service system. And so case management would be provided at least to these eight hundred some individuals now waiting for services. There's something like 200 individuals a year graduating from special education programs, waiting for services, and we don't have that in some of these other programs. When you qualify for ADC you get services. When you qualify for Medicaid you get services. When you qualify for education through our public schools you get services. But when you qualify for services under the Developmental Disabilities Services you wait, you wait your turn. Sometimes you wait beyond what is rightfully your turn. I know of a case in Omaha that was brought to my attention of a young man over the age of 21 who had a violent temper but was able to stay at home with his parents because, again, once he left the special education system he was dumped in the community that had no programs. He was number two on the waiting list in Omaha. And I got a call from his mother who, at that time, had been taking care of this individual because the father of the household had been disabled to some degree, unable to care for the son, so the mother had carried the burden and the mother was going in for brain surgery and said, I can no longer care for my son, I must have some help. Can you help me? And we called the region, said, can you help this family in crisis? They're number two on the waiting list. How long will it be before they get services? And the response back is, at this time it looks like two or three years. They don't have two or three years. Can you do something immediately to care for this family? This mother is going in for brain surgery. Response back, happily, shortly thereafter was, yes, we have good news for you. The wait won't have to be two or three years. We've done some juggling and we think that we can care for this individual in two or three months. Now, if you were the family in that situation, what would you think? How could you possibly respond to crisis where the system says that in maybe two or three months your terrible tragedy can possibly be dealt with? Now, this individual had been number two. The rest of the story is for two or three years already at
