

November 12, 1992

reasonable solutions. It can be done and it can be done properly. But if one more person comes up to me and says, well, we use electricity, it's our responsibility to take care of the waste, I don't know what I will do. I can be much more honest in my reaction now because we do. And we are a public power state and we have a responsibility to take care of the public power waste but we have no responsibility to put on the back of the citizens of Nebraska the liability of a huge power consortium from the southern United States, none whatsoever. One of my friends in Auburn likes to put it this way. I'm a hog farmer, do I expect people, when they go into the grocery store and buy pork chops, to take a bag of manure home with them? No, we don't do that in any other situation, any other situation. And, folks, this manure can stink for about five hundred years. We do not have that responsibility to these other people. If they want to take responsibility, that's fine. And, finally, I was going to run an ad to see who wants to take my place as public enemy number one on the State Chamber's list of favorite senators. And I know there are a lot of you out there that are nervous right now because when I leave somebody is going to have to move down in that cherished position. But I have enjoyed the camaraderie I have had with Jack and the boys, playing poker late at night, bowling, discussing our philosophical differences, but we need someone to take that position because we need someone to stand up for the laboring people, I mean, someone who can really understand their concerns, feel it in your guts concerns. People are constantly complaining about the cost of welfare and those same people will smile and wink while we squander millions on what I see as corporate welfare. There are big fish and little fish in this game and we all know that. When the big fish are at their best they get the little fish to do their work for them. What Ernie mentioned this morning, divide and conquer, it's worked throughout history. I like to quote Jay Gould, a railroad magnate, from about 1886. Jay liked to say, I can hire one-half of the working class to kill the other half. Sadly, that's still true today. We discussed some of it on the floor today. We're all the same out there, the people that count to me. Farmers, small business, labor, nurses, rural and urban, we're all the same, struggling to get by, hoping to save a little money, hoping to make it better for our kids. And there are some very greedy people, in my opinion, that just stand back and watch us beat on each other and smile and skim off the cream. In 1886, there were a lot of large businesses that were filthy rich and the people were eating dirt and then the corporations decided they should eat bad dirt, poor