wanted to get Napoleon off the North American continent. Napoleon had brought some of his fleet into the Caribbean because he was going to try to take back Haiti. That's what he said his purpose was because some former slaves had overthrown the white slave owners, they had burned up the towns and things like that and Napoleon sent his soldiers there and they were going to put these former slaves in their place but, instead, Napoleon's army got its pants pressed. And since they were unable to whip these former slaves on this little island, Napoleon knew that there was no way he could have a presence in this hemisphere because he could only do it by force of arms and his arms had lost their force in dealing with those people whom the bell curves say are inferior to those who were trying to reimpose slavery. So, as a result of the activities of these inferior black people in Haiti, Napoleon, the superior one, was whipped. It was that defeat that encouraged Napoleon to sell the Louisiana Territory to the United States. When you read American History as it was taught to me, you don't hear about Toussaint L'Ouverture, you don't hear about Christophe, you don't hear about Dessalines, none of the trio who were responsible for the Louisiana Purchase being made available to this country. When those kind of things are advocated as items that ought to be taught in history, there are people who say, no, no, that should not be taught, American History has to be taught the way it always has been taught. The only ones who ever did anything were white men. They were the only ones. But when we talk about the way a white man named Thomas Jefferson had illegitimate children on his slave woman, Sally Hemmings, those same people said, but we don't want that taught. And, by the way, that was written about in the newspapers of the day and Thomas Jefferson never denied it because he couldn't. The children of Sally Hemmings looked just like the children by his white wife. And people who visited Thomas Jefferson's plantation remarked about the tremendous similarity in the appearance of these children. Now they didn't give this analogy, but I will give it to you. It's like white bread and wheat bread, the only difference is in the color of the slices. They look exactly the same. So they were all baked by the same baker but they were baked in a different oven.

SPEAKER WITHEM: One minute, Senator Chambers.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: That's what it was, and President Jefferson
