

SENATOR KRISTENSEN: I do not.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Should it, in your opinion?

SENATOR KRISTENSEN: I think you ought to have the best people there. And to who that is, I don't know who those people are because I don't know who's attending. To the extent, would it make good sense to have a broad base of people geographically, ethnically and politically? It is, but I also, Senator, to blindly put those labels in there, you know, at this point in time I don't know who that might be. I don't know who they have in mind. And, quite frankly, as long as there's voting privileges, I guess that's going to be the comfort level of whoever attends that conference.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: There was an old movie, called "Twelve Angry Men", about this trial and one person went in the jury and starting talking to the people and they changed their mind. Could this board conceivably be made up of twelve angry white men, as they call themselves now?

SENATOR KRISTENSEN: Oh, Senator, I suppose it could be made up of twelve people like Senator Pedersen, yes, or Senator Witek, or Senator Matzke. They could be happy, grumpy, dopey, sneezy, whatever, yes.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: (Laugh.) I'm glad you did not name me when it went down the catalogue of characteristics of those you had named.

SENATOR KRISTENSEN: I was saving one, if you will go through that list...

SENATOR CHAMBERS: I understand.

SENATOR KRISTENSEN: ...you'll know that one is still left.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: I understand. Now, does a state have to pay a membership fee to join the corporation?

SENATOR KRISTENSEN: Senator, I'm not aware that there is a membership fee, and I'm going to tell you that my assumption is that there will be a registration fee of some kind, just because you're going to have to pay for the convention space.
