

the current analysis of the state of things. They're working on computer systems. We keep getting a promise that computer systems, better computer systems will be in place shortly and encompass more districts, more counties, and I think that is true, that will happen before much longer has passed. But that doesn't mean that simply because you can't rely upon the records on first glance that we don't rely upon the records and get things straightened out before legal actions are taken. Right now, right now, just to enforce child support orders we have to rely upon those same records. Right? And county attorneys, they don't go in filing legal actions and lawsuits before they have double checked those records. So when the Clerk of the District Court's records show something, what will happen before an attorney will file an action, they will go down to the Clerk of the District Court's office and they will look back through the court file to be sure that the records are correct and they will contact the party involved to be sure that they agree that the records are correct before anything is done. And the same thing would happen with license revocation in the event that the records showed that child support was short. There would be double checks before a court action was taken. In fact, right now everybody knows you have to double check before you involve yourself further to be sure that the records are correct. So I don't think that what we're doing requires any more or less exactitude as to the records that exist. Obviously, we would all like to have the Clerks of the District Court have better machinery, better computers and be better trained in this whole area, and we're working on that. But I don't think that that's a reason to treat license revocation differently than we actually treat the collection of the child support or garnishments or income tax refunds today under the law. Thank you.

PRESIDENT ROBAK: Thank you, Senator Feutler. Senator Lindsay.

SENATOR LINDSAY: Thank you, Madam President members, first I apologize for not being here earlier to handle the...open on the committee amendments. I had a deposition that had been scheduled before I knew it was going to be up today. I rise in opposition to the Day amendment and I'm somewhat disappointed, actually extremely disappointed that it came about. When we were trying work on this bill when it was in committee, in the committee there was not a great deal of strength for the bill, I think would probably be an understatement, in the committee. We met in the Governor's office with several members of the
