process as well. And one of the things that the task force recommended, and there was some various...there were differences of opinion on the recommendation, but, in essence, the task force said that we want to have pilot projects of which there would be a joint, and that is a shocker for anyone who has been working with Social Services and foster care on the Foster Review Board, working together pilot projects, and it pains me and saddens me to say that that the first step. It is almost as if you are talking with the PLO in Israel in the old days. If you can just get them to talk civilly together in the same room, that is a major step, and we might be able to go to the next step and actually talk about what's best for children or the nation, whatever the case...whatever analogy we are going to use. We were going to...we were proposing pilot projects with both the department and Social Serv...Foster Care Review Board would jointly begin working together on reviews. There are some things that they were going to have to work out. They were going to have to...

PRESIDENT ROBAK: One minute.

SENATOR BERNARD-STEVENS: ...work out some differences between the two on who would actually write the report, what would happen if they disagree, what would...how many other reviews could they do, and so on; all of those could have and should have been worked out. What we have now is a bill that Senator Avery actually confuses the issue even more because, in essence, Senator Avery's bill is going to set up joint reviews even though he is saying he wants...he doesn't want to do that, because five people are transferred over one year, and those that are still in Social Services will work with those in the Foster Care Review Board, that's a joint looking at that, and then later on another five go over, and we then transfer all authorities of review to Foster Care without any feeling of whether or not there is the volunteers to do it, and without any real understanding of what major bureaucracy we are going to begin to establish with the Foster Care Review Board, which in its inception was not envisioned to be a massive bureaucracy, as it may turn out to be.

PRESIDENT ROBAK: Time. Thank you, Senator Bernard-Stevens. Senator Hillman to speak to the Schimek amendment.

SENATOR HILLMAN: Yes, Madam President and members, I'll try not to be repetitious but I, too, want to give you a little bit of
