refuse to vote for an issue. Where if it's brought to the floor, there might be 35 people that agree with it. It's just the makeup of the committee that sometimes makes a difference on a bill. And in many cases the committees last year, and I suspect years before that, made the decision that hey, if we're not going to...if we can't advance the bill, let's at least get it off the docket and kill it. I mean don't just let it sit here. And I...Senator Hudkins is, is shaking her head yes, that's what happened in many cases. And if that's the case, that is a committee difficulty which they can't, they're deadlocked on a committee, they can't get the bill out, and so they kill it because at least it gets it off the agenda. I think that senator has every opportunity that introduced the bill to say, look, I think that that particular group of eight people of 49 was set in their ways when the bill was announced, I would like to have my chance to see if the entire floor thinks if it's something worth discussing. And maybe it's a crime issue, maybe it's something else for the most part. And so we bring it to the floor, even though it had been killed by the committee, we bring it to the floor to say, look, is the...was the committee representative of the entire Legislature? Was it representative of the people of the state of Nebraska? And many times the committee are not necessarily representative of the whole Legislature. And I think we need to add a courtesy to the senators that introduced the bills on that issues, whether I agree with them or not, they should have the ability to bring to the floor that which four people on a committee may have blocked from, from advancing. And many times you and I all know, my colleagues, that some senators will block measures not because they're necessarily against it, but as a political move against, in order to cause something else to happen. And so I think we need to look at it and say, look, because of our committee structure, because there is only one committee that can deal with it, that a senator needs to have the option even if it's killed to ask the Legislature to vote on it. Most of the time the Legislature says, no, we're not going to deal with it, the bill's already killed. We all come up and say, this was a bill that was killed in committee, and the Chair of the committee will give the best arguments to why. But every once in a while the committee will make a mistake or the committee simply killed the bill because they couldn't advance it, that should not punish the idea, that should not punish the senator that introduced the bill, they should have their chance to put it, to put it straightforward. Senator Chambers, I also want to
