

say, the bills that came to, and I know you still get them, from the ophthalmologist and the optometrists, the podiatrists wanted hospital privileges or something, I think...if I remember correctly, Don, they settled their differences out in the hall one day and we didn't have to do that one bill because they stayed so long out in the hall while you were...we had long hearings, why they came to some kind of an agreement. Well, maybe we should do that again, Senator Landis is very convincing. But you have to remember, Senator Landis is a great actor, too. So he can...and I'm very careful not to look into those blue eyes and believe everything he says. But I am concerned about this particular thing because a lot of the fears that some of us have about whether or not to, and listening to Senator Robinson and his rather gory experiences, you do want to be sure when you're in the extremities that the person that's taking care of you is doing the right thing. Well, I've been there. I'm sure every one of you, some time or another, has been there when you, the nurses are looking at you in the emergency room, the doctors are there, but they don't come in the very first thing, even in the emergency room. So I don't, I think we have to realize that nurses, even...the LPNs, the RNs all have a lot of talent and a lot of knowledge and skill that quite often is the difference between life and death when you're hanging on waiting for a doctor to come in. I still don't know how I'm going to vote on this particular amendment. If it moves onto General File...or to Select File today, I guess I think as David Landis thinks, maybe they should still be talking. You can't just stop because you are...the professions do that to us regularly. It isn't just this group. They say, well, we can't figure it out so it's up to you. Well, I'm not sure that's true. I'm not sure that we should be making some of these decisions and putting them into statute and then let the chips fall where they may. I am very...I'm grateful to Don Wesely, you're the one that passed all this information out because yesterday we were, I couldn't find everything. I found the educational requirements. I hope you're all, all looked at the educational requirements because the nurse practitioners are Ph.D.s. They have a doctorate that gives them...that represents a lot of hours in classrooms and in clinical and so on. They a lot of hours. They have a lot of knowledge that an RN doesn't have. Also, the fact sheet, but on the fact sheet I do have one quick question and maybe you don't know. Don, do you know, on the rural committee...rural communities it says seventeen of them, 81 percent of them are in rural communities. Now does
