occur a little bit greater degree than what they do in other parts of the state, since most of the chases do occur in the Omaha area. But it is a concern of people, to the taxpayers, first, because of the pursuits, and, secondly, because of the liability issues that affect the city of Omaha. Now it isn't something that is...is just talked about once a year here down at the Legislature, a bill is brought in, and then the committee examines it, and it's forgotten about. This is something that's been talked about on a monthly basis. One of the approaches that was brought forward was the use of helicopters to try to deal with the high-speed pursuit chases, along with other...use of the helicopters for other types of law enforcement, and I...I believe that this is something that other cities have used to try to deal with the problem, and I think it's an approach that the city is saying, we're not going to stand back and just continue to have these high-speed pursuit chases because, certainly, the legislation the state adopted did not stop these types of pursuits. It only stated that if they are going to be involved in these pursuits that they make especially certain that people will not be inadvertently injured as a result of these high-speed pursuits. So the city has made modifications through the years. First they kind of slowed down the process. Now we are back to the point where I think where they continue on with the pursuits, but they make darn sure that they are...that this is something that they need to be pursuing. Now, you know, I think most of us realize that when you are involved in a situation, we've probably watched enough shows where we see the bank robber run out of the bank and police pursue them in high speed, and I think there is not a person in this body that would disagree that involving...cases involving a bank robbery or any type of felony case where a police officer is involved in a high-speed pursuit, that's something that needs to occur. But, you know, what do you do in these judgment calls where someone runs a red light and they proceed on a high-speed pursuit or...you know, they could go on for miles, or the case where you have drunk driver and they involve in a high-speed pursuit. I know Senator Vrtiska doesn't like to get quoted too often. He got quoted in the paper here yesterday or today and he was a little...little upset about that, but I am going to quote one conversation that I did have with him this morning about high-speed pursuits, and he cited the example of that authoritative TV show called "Cops" and they had a camera along with an individual that was involved in a high-speed pursuit, and this guy, this police officer was following this gentleman
