I do have a question for Senator Hillman, if she'd be...

SPEAKER WITHEM: Senator Hillman.

SENATOR HILLMAN: Yes.

SENATOR AVERY: In terms of your last...earlier comments, you had indicate that...I guess what I'm looking for is maybe the process. If, for instance, it's laid out where the county board has the authority or opportunity to bring it to the electorate for an election, and they don't act, maybe the people want it, or will the people have an opportunity to come back? Is this something that the people would petition the commissioners or supervisors to bring about, if they may not act on it?

SENATOR HILLMAN: Senator Avery, I would...we've discussed this some and looking at what it might be, how it would be perceived in the future, or work in the future. I would see both. I would see...could be initiated by the county commissioners. If they did not do that and there was people in the county that would like to see their form of government changed, yes, I think it should be outlined in statute whereby there would be a petition process and they could do that to get it on the ballot.

SENATOR AVERY: So it could work both ways then, as I understand.

SENATOR HILLMAN: I would think so, yes.

SENATOR AVERY: Okay. I'll...I'm going to listen a little bit. And I would relinquish any of my time to Senator Kristensen, if he wanted.

SPEAKER WITHEM: Senator Kristensen, about three minutes.

SENATOR KRISTENSEN: Thank you, Senator Avery. Thank you, Mr. President. I'm sorry I was visiting elsewhere. But I... Senator Hillman, the other concern, and I kind of...I want to keep focusing on this language simply because I don't know when Senator Chambers' amendment will be up for a vote, and perhaps this will go quickly. But let's say that a county chooses, through a vote, a majority vote, to enter into this form of county government. Do they have the opportunity to undo that? Let's say that they don't like this form. Constitutionally, how
