the items that the committee amendment is putting into Section 10, that the Housing Code Task Force would be responsible for, they would study and try to determine the factors associated with influencing the cost of housing construction, including, but not limited to, this is what they would be doing between the time that this bill was, if it is passed, and December 15th, they would have to look at state and local statutes, rules, regulations, and codes governing the construction of housing; planning and zoning processes, which influence the timing and cost of housing; local regulations. So we have this state Housing Code Task Force looking and studying all of the local regulations across our state, influencing land and infrastructure development related to housing. Pretty monumental task to be accomplished in probably six months or less. (d) The task force, on housing code, would try to determine alternative state and local incentives for the encouragement of housing development. They would have to look at all the licensing and inspection requirements of state and local government to determine duplicative or cumbersome processes or practices. They'd look at whether fiscal estimates should be required on building code revisions. You know, I think, you can read the rest of it, it's apparent that we're providing this task force with quite a bit of work and quite a bit of assessment to accomplish in the period that they have before it. I acknowledge, as Senator Wesely's handout has indicated, that this is...some of this work very well maybe has already begun. Maybe a lot of it is in various stages of being looked at. But as far as I'm concerned what we have here is local concern relative to the planning and development of their community's code enforcement, which, of course, the Legislature adopts the uniform building codes and recently, I believe within the last three or four years, took away some flexibility from local governments in that they require local governments to adopt the new updates within a three-year period of when the state does it. So we were restricting in that particular situation. And, of course, it looks or appears that what we have with this task force is an expansion of those building code issues, and planning and zoning issues, where the state is once again looking to and attempting to try to accomplish and solve a local problem. So it...I originally was going to attempt to go through and pick off a couple of the items that I felt were the most inappropriate for the task force to try to deal with. And as I started going through it, it pretty much ended up with the task force and the reason for the task force, to me, being
