

auction, which one do you think is going to wind up with the land?

SENATOR DIERKS: The man with the most money and the most clout.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Okay, thank you. That would be the rich man, as we know, and as everybody knows, the rich man wound up in hell. That's all I want to ask you, Senator Dierks. You didn't say that. This...there are a lot of things going on with reference to the sale of this land, and I know some of the senators are supporting this bill because they think that if the land is sold to somebody, and it can be put on the tax rolls, there's going to be a reduction in property tax, and all these other things. But I still see it as one of those situations where a group of shortsighted politicians, and I think Senator Bromm is one of the shortsighted ones, contrary to what he has indicated, are looking at a specific issue today, and they want to fashion a remedy that will have negative repercussions in the future when the politicians on this floor will no longer be here. And those, in future generations, will say, why did the Legislature do that? But the ones to whom they need to address the question will no longer be there. So we create problems that others will have to try to solve. I am opposed to this bill, and if my opposition is construed as being emotional, then I accept that. If it is construed as being sacrilegious, I accept that. If it is construed as being wise, prudent, intelligent, careful, and trendsetting, I certainly accept that. But however we characterize it is really insignificant. We should look at what the impact is going to be on these future generations that we are always talking about when we don't like certain federal programs, you know, talking about burdening those farther down the line. Well, what can happen here? Somebody talked about Apple computer, and I was telling Senator Wesely I think I read in the paper where they are suffering losses upon losses upon losses. Things that look very bright and glittering today turn out to be fool's gold tomorrow, and if the money is, the state's money is put in the fool's gold, the state loses like any other fool, and they are not going to recoup it. Senator Bromm, I don't think...

SENATOR COORDSEN: One minute.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: ...has framed the issue broadly enough, and I certainly think that there is a contrary or alternative point of
