benefits. The new employee says, pay and benefits are pretty good. And the employer says, yeah, and we have a collective bargaining unit here and we've agreed, as an employer, with this collective unit that this company will be a fair share company. And the guy says, what does that mean? And the employer says, well, if you come to work here you got to know that you...that the collective bargaining unit, by law, is required to bargain for you and we, as an employer, think that it's fair that they ought to pay part of the cost of that collective bargaining. And so the fellow has a choice. If he doesn't want to pay a fair share, he doesn't need to come to work there. He doesn't need to come to work there. The employer doesn't need to be a fair share company. My gosh, it's hard for me to understand how the law could be more fair than what this one has been made to be over time. Thank you.

SPEAKER KRISTENSEN: Senator Tyson.

SENATOR TYSON: Call the question.
