SENATOR WEHRBEIN: And that's rather than Senator Crosby, who I...whose bill it is. (Laugh) But, Senator Bromm, that's one of the reasons, as I was listening to Senator Beutler, and I punched on before he filed his amendment, I'm not clear on this and I'm not really very understanding of how this works. But what is the average person going to do if this happens to them? How is this prosecuted? It looks like to me that it's...this is very difficult to get a handle on. It says a seller shall not, shall not, shall not, but what if they do and hang up and leave, or you can't find them, or they're doing it from a corner pay phone? I've never had this experience per se of offering, although I think maybe I have and I just simply say no and hang up, but how in the real world is this going to work if someone is on the verge of getting scammed, or doesn't even know that they're scammed? What do they do the next day? Would you mind going through a scenario, because I really can't understand how this will work.

SENATOR BROMM: Sure. If someone does feel that they have been the victim of a violation of this act, they have at least a couple of alternatives. One is certainly under the act they can bring an action through their own legal counsel to recover damages, or an injunction to prevent the party from bothering them again. They can go to the county attorney and the county attorney can file a complaint charging the violator with a Class I misdemeanor. They can go to the Attorney General's Office and the Attorney General's Office...I don't view the Uniform Deceptive Trade Practices Act as necessarily unavailable without Senator Beutler's amendment to apply to certain situations that could occur under this act. In any event, it does give the state, and that would be through the Attorney General, the right to bring an action for damages or injunctive relief, or a cease and desist order if a company persists in violating the act. So you've got the choices of going to your own attorney, to the county attorney, or I would say to the Attorney General and perhaps, you know, if a person doesn't feel that this is something for their own attorney to handle or it's too expensive, I would contact the Attorney General and the county attorney right away if it happened to me.

SENATOR WEHRBEIN: Well, does it make your word against someone
