list than you saw above. Again, is it appropriate to replace that language with the broader phrase "mechanical aid or prostheses", or do you want to have a list of the kinds of devices that are necessary for persons who have had a double amputation to get around with? Individuals with progressive, now this is...this is an interesting one, individuals with progressive neuromuscular or neurological diseases...or disease such as to preclude locomotion, familiar phrase, without the regular aid of, and now a different list, braces, crutches, canes, wheelchairs, or artificial limbs. And, again, that phrasing would be replaced with "mechanical aid or prostheses". And then words that are again...it's a later issue in the definition, but this one has to do with your upper body, your limbs, your arms, "or who have permanently lost the use or control of both arms", "lost the use or control of both arms". Now that language is changed in the committee amendment so we say, "have a permanent partial disability of both arms in excess of 75 percent." That's a change. But the other language is, in some respects, archaic. It contains three different lists. We know that technology changes all the time. I don't know whether a wheelchair is one of these little three-wheeled carts that have electric motors on them. I don't know if that's a wheelchair, but it serves the same purpose as a wheelchair so would you include that in this list? That's the reason for using the phrasing "mechanical aid". Now, let's talk about a truly peculiar circumstance. Let's talk about someone who, instead of having a progressive neuromuscular or neurological disease, and I'm not quite sure what that is. Maybe it's something like Alzheimer's, for example. Muscular dystrophy was suggested to me from the side. If you have muscular dystrophy you can qualify at a point when you have to get around with canes, wheelchairs, artificial limbs, crutches, or braces. But let's say that you're minding your own business one day and you have a stroke. You become a quadriplegic.

PRESIDENT MAURSTAD: One minute.

SENATOR WICKERSHAM: You do not have the use of your arms. You do not have the use of your legs. Guess what. You're not eligible for the homestead exemption. Do you look like the person that has MS? What is your condition? Should you qualify? Because you had a sudden event, a single event, you
