think schools still ought to make their own decisions on that and some of the money that we have done for that should...could be allocated or reallocated, whatever the case is. One of my questions is if this, how much of this, you can answer on your own time, Senator Stuhr, I won't ask you at this point, but how much of this will be truly equipment versus program? I, too, am concerned about the ongoing...potential ongoing demand for operating if this goes much beyond equipment. If it's technology equipment, which I was originally led to believe, it now sounds like to me, I would be interested in a percent that you think would be equipment which I would consider a one-time cost. I am also concerned about the fact if the lottery funds would decline would we be expected to make that up or would we hear that? And I know we can't look that far ahead and know exactly what schools will do but, typically, that's what happens in, i.e., the use of federal funds. Federal funds, many times, are started with good intentions and then they go away, and then we're expected to pick up the difference. I hope this would not be synonymous with that type of concern. I, too, am concerned about the hypocritical side of lottery funds. I've never supported gambling in here, and I find myself now allocating those funds through the trust funds and other things, allocating money for advertising, because the decision was made. That's one of the problems, I guess you'd say, with democracy is that once the...once the decision is made, most of us are obligated to an extent to carry out the will of the majority. I hate to see this connection made. I don't know whether it's always necessarily the direct connection to what we're doing but you can't deny the fact that those funds are going to something else that would indirectly. I had another point I wanted to make, can't remember what it was at this point, so I'm going to quit, but I haven't made a decision totally on this. I...I still would listen to the debate, especially those of you in education. And I was going to ask Senator Wickersham, in a joking manner, you said you signed on the bill and you said you voted against it in committee, and you weren't going to change your mind. I wonder which one that was. Thank you.

PRESIDENT MAURSTAD: Thank you, Senator Wehrbein. Discussion on the bracket motion, Senator Chambers.
