of a...not a commission or a department or anything, but of additional employees directed towards a specific purpose. But I think you have to look in each case at the nature of the solution devised, considered in proportion to the scale of the problem that you have. And, clearly, we make institutional changes all of the time, depending on the seriousness and the permanency that we see in particular problem. For example, we create whole departments for areas where we know we have a continuing concern permanently, more or less--a Department of Education, a Department of Environmental Quality. These things are going to be around...are a core of problems that are going to be around forever and we direct resources towards those problems on a permanent basis. And sometimes we're looking at problems that, hopefully, are not permanent but may be somewhat long-term, and we create institutions or take actions to address those kinds of problems. In that regard, I would cite such things as the Equal Opportunity Commission and the commission...the former Commission on Aging, and the Rural Development Commission. I don't think the problem, economically in our rural areas, is going to be permanent forever, but we did set up a commission to deal with that problem in the near future. Likewise with the Equal Opportunity Commission, I'm idealistic enough to believe that the day may come when racial problems are so minor in this society that we don't need an Equal Opportunity Commission; it will be able to be taken care of by the regular actions of the courts in their regular processes. But, for the time, we have it and we have it in a very institutional form. There used to be a Commission on Aging because, at one point in time a few years ago when I first came into the Legislature, that problem was not being focused on, and so we created a whole separate commission to deal with that. Subsequently, that commission I think has been decommissioned and is...and the programs and the ideas and everything that it directed attention towards has been accommodated in the mainstream of the Department of Health initiatives. So that's what happens in our government over time. It's one of the wonderful things about democratic government--it's never the same. You look at the problem. As you solve the problem, you change your institutional focus to address the scale of the problem at any particular point in time. With this bill you're not even creating a commission. It says that the Director of Health and Human Resources (sic) shall hire a person to lead
