of very compelling examples of what needs to be done in this area. This is an area that I have a personal commitment to and have a long involvement in. I have been involved on the federal level in advocating that women be included in clinical trials and research. I started "Race for the Cure", which is a race in Omaha and we hope that soon it will be in other places, that benefits "Every Woman Matters" so that low-income women can have the follow-up care that they need when they have a questionable biopsy. I'm also absolutely committed to early education and prevention. But my question has always been, how do you best improve situations which, as we have discussed today, clearly need improvement? Is it best done by separating things, by having separate trials, or is it best done by insisting that all clinical trials include women as part of the participants? Do we best do it by micromanaging and telling administrators what they must do, or do...and then my fear is that, once we've done that, then we sit back and assume that everything's going to be fine; that by telling them to hire somebody then everything's going to be fine. Or do we best do it by staying vigilant even when we have situations where there...we have someone in a particular place, we have a woman in a particular place? Do we best do it by working with a Governor and with the administration to insist that our agencies and our institutions do what they're supposed to do? For me, this is difficult because this is an area that I feel so strongly about, but I have to...I have to question whether I'm inconsistent when I have worked so hard to try to get people to look at whether we are creating things when...when maybe we should just be insisting that we do things correctly with the agencies and institutions that we have and, because this happens to be something that I have personal feelings about, then this is an exception. We have to look at every single thing to see whether...whether we are creating any kinds of duplications and whether this is not something that we should assume...assume that that's a part of what government is supposed to be doing. Government is supposed to be concerned about the health of over half of its citizens. I think that...that we need to take the harder route and expect that our institutions, our bureaucracy, is doing what it's supposed to do and expect that that's what it's...that changes are that...to make sure that it does what it's supposed to do. And...and, as Senator Beutler used the word that it becomes part of the mainstream, isn't that...
