LB 608

But I believe that something new is created here that may not be in the law right now. You are absolutely correct in saying that the person qualifies one week at the time, and at the end of five weeks that person would be deemed unemployed, because the $2,500 would be exhausted. But I believe with the language in this bill that if the person remains unemployed then you can come back and recover for those other five weeks that you were disqualified for, because they were saying the $2,500 you received would cover five weeks at your base salary. If you only were off for the five weeks, that would...that would be a wash. But, if you're off for more than five weeks, then I believe, with the language that's in this bill now, and I would argue that way if it applied to me, that there are additional weeks being claimed, and because this says it has to be prorated over all of those weeks, then I can come back and recover for those first five weeks, because when you prorate it out, not one of those weeks gave me an amount equal to my base salary...

SPEAKER KRISTENSEN: One minute.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: ...or, if I were unemployed for just six weeks, when you prorate five weeks of pay over six weeks, not one of those weeks would give me an amount equal to my base salary. That's the point that I'm making, and that's the way I read the language.

SENATOR MATZKE: Mr. Speaker, do I have any time left?

SPEAKER KRISTENSEN: You have approximately thirty seconds.

SENATOR MATZKE: Well, Senator Chambers, I think this discussion has clarified that, and we've built some legislative history on that issue. I do not agree with your interpretation. I think that it says attributable to the weeks claimed. Once you've used up that 500 a week for five weeks, there's nothing more to attribute to it, you see. So I don't think that the employee would be in any way at...

SPEAKER KRISTENSEN: Time.

SENATOR MATZKE: ...a disadvantage after that five weeks.
