you actually feel better. "Pandora" is over here giving me the technical names, but I'm not going to use them, because I had said we're using ordinary English in drafting these bills. But she's absolutely correct in what she said. If a person has what is deemed a quantifiable, physical ailment, so that in determining how much in the way of a benefit you would...that person would receive, you might say 10 percent disabled, up to 100 percent disabled. You quantify it. When it comes to the mental, there is no chart that is going to give a reading. There is no gauge that is going to measure it. There are tests that are given, conversations engaged in, consultations, and people who are supposedly expert in this area will give their best guess. And that's what it is they're dealing with. Medicine is not a science, medicine is an art. What works on one person who has certain symptoms will not work on another. It's why some people can be given certain medication for AIDS and there will be a remission or an apparent remission, and on others it will not work at all; the same way with cancer. So it's an art, they do the best that they can. But nevertheless, people are not as uncomfortable in dealing with the physical, because it's observable. When we get into the realm of the mental or the psychological, all of the superstitions...

SPEAKER KRISTENSEN: One minute.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: ...come into play, the mysticism, the mystery, the religion, the question as to whether somebody has violated a law of God and is being punished. Maybe the parents did something wrong and this unfortunate one is being punished. But whatever the reason, people with mental disabilities have always been viewed, throughout history, as being possessed with that which is evil. I have to turn my light on again.

SPEAKER KRISTENSEN: Senator Robak.

SENATOR ROBAK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, members of the body. All that I'm doing with this amendment is requesting that criteria be equalized to include homeowners with mental disabilities, just as it already does with physical disabilities. People with mental illnesses are often left out or discriminated against because the general population does not understand the situation. If there's somebody here on the floor
