LB 179

And some of those mental impairments, and I'll just name a few right now, the most outstanding is schizophrenia, bipolar, just to name a few, those are not hard to diagnose. You don't need...Senator Wickersham said something about a doctor to do...to diagnose all this, would have to have some medical reference to be included in this homestead exemption bill. I think most of these people that suffer from major mental illnesses, such as bipolar and schizophrenia, already have doctors. It isn't going to be that much to get a report from that doctor. There are ways now that we can tell. PET scans, for example, give a clear definition of mental illnesses, of bipolar and schizophrenia and acute major depression, clinical depression, not situational depression. We have psychiatrists that treat the brain just as we have MDs that treat physical condition, so I see no...no reason that they should be separated or that...even that hard to implement. Senator Coordsen mentioned him being cruel and heartless. I don't think that he's cruel and heartless. I think he's just a little bit misinformed as to what mental illness entails, and I feel real bad about that because I felt that this would...this amendment is one step that we could make in our unique one-house Legislature to end the discrimination, the stigma that surrounds those with mental illness. It is no different than any other physical illness. Thank you.

SENATOR SCHIMEK: Thank you, Senator Robak. Senator Tyson, you are recognized to speak.

SENATOR TYSON: Thank you, Madam President, members of the body. I rise in opposition to the Robak amendment and I would point out to the body that Senator Robak has, with admirable persistence, carried a bill for a number of years, and I don't recall offhand how many years it's been, to mandate insurance coverage for mental illness. Now, as a result of Senator Robak's persistence and attention to this subject, there has been some ongoing negotiations that may fine down the coverage, mandatory coverage, on mental health issues to, I believe, four, all of which are treatable with medication. These include schizophrenia, bipolar disorder, acute depression, and I, offhand, can't remember the other one. I would point out, however, that the Robak amendment isn't limited to those that are capable of being diagnosed with precision. I've got here a
