basis for not doing the right thing in this area of the law. Business people get all kinds of breaks every which way you turn. When we have bills dealing with restrictions on unemployment compensation, or restriction on what kind of medical care can be sought, that's not done for ordinary people, that's done for the people with the fat pockets, a lot of bucks, and with clout in this Legislature. If poor people were to put together some kind of luncheon for the senators, it would consist of such poor fare that no senator would go with the intention of eating what is presented, because it's all right, from our standpoint, to know that the poor do not fare sumptuously ever, as long as we don't have to share that with them. They're lucky if they have a little gruel. My good friend, Senator Tyson, would say, now if you fill a bathtub full of hot water and take a good can of Campbell's chicken noodle soup and pour it in that bathtub, why, you've got enough to feed a whole neighborhood of poor people. He wouldn't do that, I hope. (Laugh) But let me not be presumptuous on that score. If the Legislature is going to recognize that people having certain disabilities are entitled to certain types of consideration, I don't think the line ought to be drawn between the physical and the mental. As Senator Wickersham has suggested and Senator Coordsen has more specifically stated, there are descriptions of physical disabilities in the law. That could be done, not with the same kind of precision, but with a greater degree of exactitude than is found in the language contained in Senator Robak's amendment. I'm glad that she offered it. I'm glad she brought this matter to our attention. And, Senator Robak, for that I salute you and applaud you. I'm glad that you're here to continually remind us of what our duties and responsibilities ought to be toward that element of society which we still tend to regard as being possessed, cursed, or somehow otherwise cut a few notches below the rest of us.

SENATOR SCHIMEK: One minute.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: You have been in this body long enough to know what is likely to be the fate of this amendment. The fact that it's not going to be supported is not something that you ought to take as an indication that what you're offering is not the appropriate thing. Sometimes society, and in many cases the
