They're sold in east Omaha where the poorer homes are. I think that's wrong. You know it's interesting, Senator Baker mentioned that really it's a loss leader for him. The impact of lottery sales on food stores was illustrated on a survey that was done in California by the California Groceries Association. Two-thirds of the 1,200 stores contacted in that survey reported a decline in food sales after the California lottery began. Holiday Quality Foods of California actually stopped selling lottery tickets because it experienced a 10 percent decline in profits and then, boy, if there was ever a tax on poor, I believe this is it. The poor tend to be greater victims of the lottery simply by virtue of the fact that they have smaller incomes. For poor, lottery is not a harmless entertainment, it's a desperate but vain attempt to survive, but the odds of winning are so cruel, so cruel, that lottery turns out to be theft by consent. Almost all lottery players lose. You know, what chance do you have, think about this? I love...I love baseball. I love to go to the College World Series. I'd love to see a no-hitter. The chances of seeing a no-hitter are 1 in 1,300. Finding a pearl in an oyster, 1 in 12,000. Being dealt a royal flush in five-card stud, 1 in 650,000. Having quadruplets, 1 in 700,000. Being struck by lightning, 1 in 1,900,000, and yet we tell the poor, we tell the people of this state that you can go out and buy a lottery ticket and win. Win, when there is one chance in 18 million. I mean, come on. Let's have truth in advertising. At least let's tell the people of this state what their chances of winning are. There really is no chance in winning. There is no chance in winning. And to see the ads on our television screen, I had a bill in a couple of years ago on this issue, where it becomes almost...you look at that ad and you see the wonderful things that the lottery is doing, that they're...

SENATOR SCHIMEK: One minute.

SENATOR JENSEN: ...doing for education, that they're doing for the environment, and it is my social and moral responsibility almost to go out and buy a lottery ticket, that makes me sick. What is the role of government? We need to think about that, and then I think we need to vote for Senator Chambers' amendment on LB 791. Thank you.
