reams of articles from the newspapers, excerpts from books, other publications showing the erratic way in which the death penalty is handed out, and then the even more erratic way in which it is actually carried out. If you were to look at all of the murderers, you could say that they would fill up that alcove area where the Clerk and the President are located. Those are all of the murderers. If you want to look at those who were entitled or eligible for the death penalty, say that they were...they would fill up that block that includes the board, not just the board, but that block that is away from the wall. All those are eligible for the death penalty. Those who actually are sentenced to death might make up that area of the board which contains the number of the bill and the time by the digital clock. Those who are actually executed may be the size of the top part of the number three. In other words, by the time you get down to the point of actually killing people, there is the greatest amount of disparity and unfairness. As one of the Supreme Court judges said in the case of Furman v. Georgia, when the Supreme Court struck down all death penalty statutes in the country because of the way they were administered, being sentenced to die and executed is like being struck by lightning. There is no rhyme, no reason. You look again at the few who are on death row, and there is no rational reason for them to be there, when the vast majority of those eligible for the sentence are not there. When a punishment is not applied on the vast majority of those for whom it is designed, it is not a punishment, it is a perversion of the law. I spent the last hours, the couple of days that two prisoners spent on this earth, and those were the worst experiences of my life. I was not going to do it, because I did not want my presence to suggest, nor anything I did to suggest that I would be complicit in the state killing anybody. But I was requested by the condemned men to be there. And one of them, John Joubert, was a man that I could say probably was universally hated. So if there was ever a person who needed somebody to look out for his interests at that time, when nobody cared, he was the man. And it was not too much for me, despite the terrible crimes for which he was convicted and sentenced, it was not too much for me to be there with him during those last two days, and especially during his last hours. It takes more than a notion to get a person, not only from the courtroom where he is sentenced to die,...
