barbershop. I think about 50 years ago when the average farm was probably 80 to 160 acres and, Senator Chambers, in my small town that I grew up in there were 4 barbershops in that town and the population of that town was around 900 people. Now, today, there is one barbershop. The town is still the same size. The only thing is the farms probably average 800 to 1,000 acres so there are less...less rural population out there to come in to those...to those towns to do their trading. Not only were there four barbershops. There were five grocery stores; today there's one. Still 900 people. There were two produce stations where you brought your eggs, cream, and chickens. There were two department stores; there are none. There are no produce stations anymore because nobody raises chickens or milks cows and separates the cream. Those were the two products they handle. There were two blacksmith shops; today there is none. There were two drug stores; today there is one. So, you see, not only has agricultural...agriculture need something like this. Young farmers need the help. I'm not too sure that the old geezer that's selling that land or getting out needs the help. Now, let me tell you, I think there's enough breaks out there. Or an old geezer like me, if I want to sell my grocery store, I've been in business long enough I should be able to weather that storm when I sell out. But it's the poor young person, it's the young merchant, the young farmer are the ones that we should be worried about, we should be giving the breaks to. That's the way I feel. If we don't have the young merchants to replace old people like me, or the young farmers to replace people like Senator Dierks, what's going to happen? You're going to see the corporate farms. And I guess that...if that's the way we want to go maybe it should be. Or I'll close my grocery store because no young kid will be able to get enough money together to make a down payment on the darn thing. So maybe there will be no grocery stores in my town. Could happen. Maybe all we'll have is convenience stores like Senator Baker's. I hope not, but I want you to realize that it's not only...it's not only rural Nebraska in the agricultural...the farmers. It's also the merchants in small town Nebraska. And I think it should be for that young person, the breaks should come to him, not the old geezers. Thank you.

PRESIDENT MAURSTAD: Senator Janssen. Senator Chambers.
