body. Actually, as a school board member, I did see copies of the NAEP test, I saw them two years ago, and I do not share some of the fears which some of the public have had. I know that some of the questions that are on there look invasive, but they're trying to build up demographic information so that they can compare and look at whether students in different groups are actually performing at different levels. So the intent is not diabolical, Senator Jones, at all. However, the concern that I did have as I was looking at these secure tests, number one, is the fact that there has been so much secrecy surrounding it. I think that when you have a good product you don't really have to be so worried. And when a test is over and people are not going to take that test, there's certainly no concern about letting them look at the document. But the one thing that did concern me, as I looked at the material, is the fact that math certainly was innocuous, the science questions were fine, but the literature that they chose sometimes can teach values. Any good teacher can tell you that if they want to teach values they'll use literature. People have done it for hundreds of years. They know that by showing you a hero who lives out all of the good values that you are instilling those values in the children that read the stories. And so one of the concerns I had was some of the documents in looking at a story, and I'm just going to tell you the story and let you judge for yourself whether they were teaching something in the test or whether they were just merely testing. In the story there was a gentleman. He was very poor. He worked in the factory. But when he came home at night he was very tired after working strenuously all day. He sat down and he ate his dinner with his wife and enjoyed it very much because he was hungry. Then he would pick up his fiddle, he would play and entertain himself and his wife with his music during the evening and, of course, he would be very tired and so he would sleep well at night. The gentleman who lived next door was the factory owner and he used to listen to the music of the gentleman next door and enjoy it and wonder why he was not happy as his neighbor was and why he had trouble sleeping at night when his neighbor seemed to enjoy good rest at night. And so the factory worker (sic) decided he was going to reward the worker who lived next door and he decided to give him enough money to buy a business of his own. And when he told the factory worker, the factory worker got very excited. He came home and he told his wife that, as she laid out dinner before
