SENATOR RAIKES: That's a possibility, Senator.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Thank you, Senator Raikes.

PRESIDENT MAURSTAD: Time. Further discussion on the reconsideration motion? Senator Schmitt.

SENATOR SCHMITT: Yes, Mr. Lieutenant Governor. I've been listening to this. I guess I was listening to the amendment that Senator Chambers had put up there changing a couple words to "may" rather than "will" and "can", and listening to some of this, and have taken an interest in it here all at once. And I know Senator Chambers is just trying to eat up the eight hours, but I'm going to yield him my time.

PRESIDENT MAURSTAD: Senator Chambers.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Thank you, Senator Schmitt, and I'm licking my chops. There are substantive issues in this bill, substantive flaws in it. But remember, the geniuses worked on this bill. I'm not even a revenue man. Never have I served on the Revenue Committee. You know the only thing that I have going for me? Senator Raikes, unlike you, all I have is a poor, little bachelors degree in history. I have a poor, little degree in law, but those higher reaches of academia were intimidating to me, so I just left them alone. But while I was in undergraduate school, I took some English classes. Some people were amazed at how I did on an entrance exam at Creighton, because I was a black youngster from the ghetto, as it was called, in Omaha, where we were all supposed to be culturally deprived and educationally deficient. I attended Tech High School, which was deemed to be a fringe school where you dumped people, and those go who might be able to work with their hands, if you can teach them the difference between the right hand and the left hand. If you can teach them how to drive a nail without bending it, if you can teach them the difference between on and off, on a printing machine, if you can teach them how to make wooden bookends, which you would never be able to earn a living at, that's where I went to school. And I chose that school. All of my brothers and sisters went to Central High. That was the elite school, that's where the smart
