I wouldn't argue that his are equally or maybe not more important. First set of concerns I had was with the types of projects and the types of jobs that would be generated by this sort of product...proposal. First projects, by and large, I...this caught my attention with the phrase "make money for the state". These projects, convention centers, most likely will not make money for the state. Now it doesn't mean that a project that does not make money for the state is necessarily a bad one, but this is a business project that doesn't make money. And, again, that's not necessarily bad but it does put it in somewhat of a different category. This is a project that a private enterprise would not decide to undertake and, in fact, I think it's worth noting that if you did, that is if state government did decide to get involved in a project that a private enterprise would find useful to undertake, probably the state government would be invited out, and I really don't quarrel with that decision. The second concerns jobs and this point was raised in our discussion the other day. This type of an activity, as near as I can tell, would involve jobs at entry level service positions. They would involve people maintaining hotel rooms, serving food, and so on. We, in the state, at the moment I don't think are drastically in need of those sorts of jobs. In fact, if anything, we have more jobs in requiring that level than people to fill them. Move on, the throwback mechanism is of concern to me, and I think we've had enough discussion to indicate roughly the operation of that. You have a new project, it generates revenue. You determine through a series of formulas how much additional state sales and income tax is generated by that enterprise, and then that money is, I'll use the phrase, partitioned off as far as state revenues are concerned. To me, this is a bad precedent. You're saying of the total revenue generated by the state that a certain part of that sales and income is somehow separate. It is attributable to a particular activity or industry. Now, in this particular case, we're only talking about political subdivisions, but it's not hard to make the jump that if the insurance industry, for example, had a good year in Nebraska, generated some additional economic activity which yielded additional state revenues, that they may well have a claim that...
