changed, whether by initiative or by the Legislature, okay, so this is not geared towards initiatives, this is everything, the first election would be to approve the constitutional change but it would require a second vote to ratify, so it's a two-step process, two separate elections. Why is that important? Let's take the first one, is the Legislature puts on a constitutional amendment in...towards the end of its session. Summertime comes, that can be on the November election. Is there adequate time for the public to examine and look at that? Well, generally there is, but what gets lost during that period of time is you can have a highly political race for Governor, for United States Senator, a wide variety of other races that it's going to blur and take away from the attention that's given to that. Let's say you have an initiative that comes through. Those initiatives always go down to the wire to get enough signatures. That's going to be, I believe, in July, the first part of July. There is adequate history about the troubles with verifications. If you'd talk to the county clerks and the register...well, or the election commissioners in this state, they absolutely drop everything they do to verify and they cannot do a decent job of verification. Sometimes they pick every third page to look at. Sometimes they look down just to see if the signatures aren't all the same. And even with those cursory examinations, they still find some problems and some fraud. So you spend that time verifying those signatures and you really don't know if it's on until that verification process hits in the end of summer, the first part of fall, and by that time then the 30-second commercial war gears up, and it's only until the next January, after all the disclosures are made, that you find out who was behind it, who contributed money, and really what some of the motivations behind those things were. That's the reason for the second vote. They do not have to go out and get their signatures again. It's a similar notice for the verification or for the ratification process, which is the second step, which is publication in a statewide newspaper for three times. That's the increased cost, would be the cost of the second publication. So there are a number of other states out here who require more difficult ways to amend the constitution. Some Legislatures require different votes in different years. Some Legislatures have a time frame that they have to wait. But for Nebraska, with our system the way that we have, I've come to the conclusion, I think a number of other
