that could happen is that you would grow a heart, George, (laughter) a small glimmer of a heart. And when I read the quote in the paper today and heard Senator Chambers reiterate that on the floor with respect to the crematorium, I had this visual image of the tray being brought out and there were the ashes and this lump of black, what's the "F" word, Senator Bruning, flint, flint that had been Senator Chambers' heart that even the crematorium couldn't...couldn't get to. So there I share my vision with you, but more importantly the things that were said in the floor this morning are, in fact, accurate. You've heard be say before on...on General File on this issue, that were there to be no remuneration, no compensation for the time, there would be 49 members. They would be different. I think the citizens not necessarily worse or better, but different because you would have to be, in total, independently wealthy, and there are those that would do that. I don't know if the issue is pay. I don't know that this is a salaried position. But I do believe that it's an honorable position, a position of public trust, and I think that the public has a responsibility involved in this of compensating those who are representing them in a way that is in keeping with the value of the position. Legislatures, historically, have poor-mouthed themselves, and we're no different in this body. We're somehow embarrassed by being elected to an office and then taking a salary for doing that. That's not as it should be, and I think that the public opinion and the opinion sometimes reflected in the press, reflects our own opinion of ourselves. We are the receptacles of public trust and I believe that each and every person here and those who will follow us, because we will surely all leave the body at some time or the other, all are entitled to compensation, not necessarily pay, but compensation that is in keeping with the responsibilities of the job. We tend to measure things in dollars, whether that's right or wrong, but we tend to do that, and the cheaper the pay the less regard people have for the job. A few years ago, we did a survey. Nearly 70 percent of those contacted said that they would not serve in this body for any money, and perhaps all of those issues are related one to another. I don't know what a salary should be. That's not particularly important. What is this position worth to the citizens of the state of Nebraska when viewed from the standpoint of public trust? Currently, I believe that our constituents are contributing on an annual basis about 35 cents
