which turned out to be quite hurtful to that student. The issue arises how do you detail the policy in such a manner that you can respond to an incident like that, but not yet violate the policy? And so I think that's one legitimate concern that it...it may, in fact, be somewhat of a burden to a school board to be specific and detailed enough to write a policy that is appropriate. The second area, which kind of goes on the other side of the issue, I think, and if I could again address a question to Senator Beutler, suppose...

PRESIDENT MAURSTAD: Senator Beutler.

SENATOR RAIKES: ...I am a school administrator and I receive, in my role of reviewing the publication policy, a newspaper article written on a controversial topic, say death penalty. And suppose it is very well written, it follows all the guidelines of good journalism, but here I am in my position and, look, I've got other things to worry about, the roof is leaking, if it ever should happen to rain, why, water would come in, whatever other concerns I might have. But as a result of that, I say, look, I don't need this. I know that if this publication goes out there will be people in my district who object to it, it's going to cause me trouble. Senator Beutler, how would that situation be handled, number one, without this piece of legislation and, number two, with this piece of legislation?

SENATOR BEUTLER: Senator, let me back up and ask you to...

PRESIDENT MAURSTAD: One minute.

SENATOR BEUTLER: ...to repeat a little bit, and I'll let you speak on my time when it comes up, because I was distracted and talking to somebody else, and I'm not sure I heard the first part of your hypothetical.

SENATOR RAIKES: Okay, all right.

SENATOR BEUTLER: So...

SENATOR RAIKES: Again, the situation is I am a school administrator. There is an article for publication in the school newspaper that comes to me that is well written, that
