tradition. It's a great standard. It's a great thing for a society to be remembered for. But you know something that's very interesting, brothers and sisters, in Europe economic considerations are doing what all this so-called Christian principle cannot do in this country. Turkey was going to execute a man but Turkey also wants to get into the European Union, and a condition to getting into the European Union is that your country have no death penalty. That is why Russia abolished their death penalty. And Turkey said, you're not going to tell us what to do because the people, like people in Senator Bruning's district, were putting pressure on the leaders and say, kill him, kill him. So the leaders were going along with at first, then reality set in. Turkey needs that economic intercourse. So you know what they did? They stayed his execution for a year, and there are rumblings in the official tiers of Turkey, that is t-i-e-r-s, that there probably will not be an execution carried out in this case, and that Turkey will abolish its death penalty. What will it take to get America to join the European Union? Now if I could persuade enough people in this country that America's economic interest would be benefited by joining the European Union, the death penalty would be abolished just like that. And I wouldn't have to worry anymore. I wouldn't have to talk about civilizing influences, a maturing society, or a state setting a standard and an example by its conduct. All I would need to talk about is profit and loss, the stock market, a booming economy. And the ones who support the death penalty now wouldn't even be thinking about that because they've got another political hobbyhorse to jump on and ride. I take my whippings around here. And because the issues that I bring are of such consequence that when I get kicked it does convert me into a soccer ball. That's why I sympathize with soccer balls, Senator Smith, because I and the soccer ball share a similar fate. The soccer ball cannot kick back. I can. Senator Bromm thinks I shouldn't. Maybe I won't. But we'll find out in the future as those bills come through. But because I am against felony murder absolutely,...

PRESIDENT MAURSTAD: One minute.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: ...it's clear that I've got to fight Senator Brashear's bill that's going to make it easier to convict somebody of burglary, that will change the definition of
