SENATOR BRASHEAR: Right. In other words, Thanksgiving is a secular holiday, whichever, under joint custody, whichever child...whichever parent the child was with on Thanksgiving for that secular holiday, then that parent would be in control of the best interests. On Easter or Christmas, that's a religious holiday, same result.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: And the parent...

SENATOR CUDABACK: One minute.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: ...in whose home the child is staying has specific authorization, under this bill, to teach the child contrary to what the child was taught by the other parent. Isn't that true? And that could not be a basis...

SENATOR BRASHEAR: Each child...each child...or each parent, in joint or in sole custody, has the opportunity to teach the child that way.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Now do you think that putting this language in the statute to encourage that kind of thing is sound public policy?

SENATOR BRASHEAR: We aren't encouraging that kind of thing,...

SENATOR CHAMBERS: So...

SENATOR BRASHEAR: ...because the bill is replete throughout with the best interests of the child.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: But the best interests of the child is not always served by the parents, would you agree with that?

SENATOR BRASHEAR: Regrettably, I...I accept that that's at least sometimes the result.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: And part of that not being in their best interest could be one parent deliberately teaching contrary to what the other parent taught. Isn't that true? Couldn't that happen?
