the landlord have it. They're not going to hire a lawyer, because there's not enough involved to interest a lawyer. So the landlords take this generally as an extra month's rent that they can just have, and it happens with people with these guide dogs too. But let's say that it doesn't. When they decide that they're going to rent, that 25 percent of the rent amount that has to be put down in addition to the other deposit can put them in a serious bind. Since I'm going to take this bill to cloture anyway, I may as well talk about some substantive issues, as well as others along the way, to lighten the mood and the environment. Senator Hilgert and I are aware that we have people very interested in this discussion and some are anticipating my discussion of Irish history, but let me say matters affecting the Irish. Some people wonder why I would even do that because they know I cannot discuss those things without talking about the atrocious and unconscionable things done by the British to the Irish, and they wonder why I, a black person, would bring these things to the attention of the public seeming to show the plight of the Irish, when in this country the very immigrants, many of them that I am talking about, produced children and descendants who gave, and they themselves on occasion, gave black people some of the hardest times we had in this country. Some of them got together in mobs and set schools afire where black children were being taught. They engaged in riots against black people when we were not the ones doing anything to harm them. As a matter of fact, rationality would have dictated that they form an alliance with black people because we were suffering at the hands of this government, state governments, and individual slave owners and people in the populace at large worse conditions than they were running from in Ireland when the penal laws were put in place. Irish people, they could not vote. Catholics, Catholics, this is...the penal laws hit the Catholics just like the Jim Crow laws hit black people. And, while other white people in this country could sit back and not be bothered at all by the terrible things done against black people by the law itself, there were Irish Protestants who were not upset by these penal laws because they could derive some benefit. Catholics couldn't vote, they couldn't hold office, they couldn't practice law. The religion was banned. They couldn't have Catholic services. Now, to be quite frank with you, not just with Catholics, I don't know if that would be a bad thing anywhere to ban all religion, but I
