have been the one or the ones to do the study. That was the agreement. It turned out that the Attorney General does not like the work done by the subcommittee he appointed, so I guess he now is going to cry sour grapes and try to create an issue because I think he's running for a different office. At one time I was pretty sure, because this huge galleon, not gallon, galleon was launched on the sea. I don't know how many masts and sails it had, but he was standing very proudly with his telescope in one hand, his sexton in the other, and a three...three-cornered cockade on his head. Senator Tyson can correct me if any of those allusions are wrong. Proud, with his chest stuck out and one foot sitting on a keg of gunpowder. He was the only one up there and he was going to sink the ship--the N.N. Bob Kerrey, that's the Nebraska Navy Bob Kerrey. Bob Kerrey struck his colors and drifted on into port and said I'm not even going out on the sea, so now that the N.N. Bob Kerrey is back in port, riding at anchor in calm waters, we look around and we see all of these ships looming from everywhere, and it caused such a reaction in "Admiral"... "Rear Admiral" now, he was "Front Admiral", he's "Rear Admiral" now, Stenberg that his ship began to sink. And there was a line running...

PRESIDENT MAURSTAD: One minute.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: ...from his ship to shore and along that line are little four-footed creatures with a hump in the back and a long skinny tail and little paws that look just like little pink hands, running down that rope to safety and "General" Stenberg, "Rear Admiral" Stenberg's galleon is sinking, going down rear-end first, and just the nose of it is sticking out of the water and "General" Stenberg is standing on it with his hat crooked, his telescope bent, saying, what happened? I don't have the answer.

PRESIDENT MAURSTAD: Senator Chambers, you're recognized to continue.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Thank you, Mr. President. But those are some of the vagaries of politics. It's funny, almost. When he announced, I think it was Stenberg and his 13 disciples. There were about 13 senators in here who immediately jumped up and said, I support "General" Stenberg; I will go to the wall with
