this car, come buy this car. So they repeat it in the bill, and we have to cut that out. But it would be like saying these are the people who shall be appointed to this commission--Senators Redfield and Aguilar, that's subdivision (a); subdivision (b) Senator Redfield, Senator Aguilar. I think when we put something in law, people should get it the first time, and if they don't, let them go back and read it a second time instead of repeating the same thing twice. So all this amendment does is to strike redundant language. Now to kind of touch on some other parts of the bill. And people have, not everybody, have asked exactly what my intentions are with this bill. I don't know how I will ultimately vote for this bill. But we should at least try to get it in a form which, when we read the words, they will more or less say the same thing to all of us so that we're not quibbling about that part of it. Then we can deal with the policy aspect of whether we ought to select out one form of commercial activity and protect it in a way that no other commercial form of activity is protected. Now that Senator Janssen is returning to his seat, I would like to ask him a question, because I missed his comments because I was talking to somebody else at the time about the bill. Senator Janssen, you were saying something about how McDonald's franchises are operated. Would you repeat that so that I can hear what you said.

SENATOR JANSSEN: Yes, Senator...

PRESIDENT MAURSTAD: Senator Janssen.

SENATOR JANSSEN: ...Senator Chambers, I'd be glad to. The way I understand, they buy those franchises. McDonald's will have a spot in the city that they want to start with. They sell that franchise to a private individual or corporation and with the understanding that you can't integrate products, I mean you can't bring in Burger King with that,...

SENATOR CHAMBERS: So far we're together.

SENATOR JANSSEN: ...so they buy a dealership.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: That's what I said. So, if McDonald's decides that they're not going to give them more than a certain
