I've really heard that before, and so I'm asking what you have to substantiate that position?

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Well, Senator Bromm, I haven't had experience in other states but I've said over and over the difference between obtaining a conviction under a city ordinance and under a state statute, you have to plead the ordinance and prove it in Nebraska.

SENATOR BROMM: Um-hmm.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: There is no judicial notice taken of it. Failure to do that means a conviction cannot stand because that key element, that essential element is lacking. We don't know whether you have to prove an ordinance in another state. Maybe they...maybe their state deals entirely differently with that, and there is no way for this court, any court in this state, to review what the processes are in every other state, and...oh, it's my time so I can take a little more time to give an example.

SENATOR BROMM: You...it's all your time.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: No, I don't want...you know, we can continue, but the Nebraska Supreme Court has said that if a law school is accredited by at least the standards set by the American Bar Association, a graduate of that law school can take the bar in Nebraska and be allowed to practice. If it's a law school in another state, maybe it has a high ranking, but it's not accredited, and what the Nebraska Supreme Court said is that the reason it relies on this ABA accreditation is because the courts have neither the time nor the expertise to review the curriculum, the standards, and all of the aspects of these other law schools to determine whether they meet that standard, and maybe some exceed it. But in the practical world, no court can make those determinations for itself, so what they have to do is go by what a recognized accrediting agency or group would do. If it comes now to all of these, I don't know how many cities there are in every other state, I don't know how many villages, but you might have 500 court houses or locations, wherever they keep records in these cities and villages, of these kinds of convictions, and some of them you may not even find. Maybe
