I've mentioned this before, and you win the case but you cannot quantify the harm sufficiently to be granted a sizeable amount of money or any amount of money, you're given damages in name only, or nominal damages, of $1. So I would give $100 and that's all, not enough to do anything with, but acknowledging what everybody says, that HHS has done in terms of a lot of work. That by itself, a lot of work, is not a sufficient basis to start a brand new program. The discussion that is happening on the floor here today should have taken place in a committee on a bill. I was told that Catholic Charities is very strongly opposed to this proposition. I was given some information over the noonhour which I had no opportunity to look at, but apparently in that folder was that type of information. Had there been a hearing I'm sure that they would have sent somebody to express why they were opposed to it and why they may have thought it was unnecessary. Not having discussed it with anybody from Catholic Charities I will not speculate about the reason for their opposition. I'm making a presumption with what I said up to this point. But if there are agencies, and there are, which currently work with young people, I'm certain they would argue that there's a much better way to spend this $3 million per year while we put together a plan to rectify the problems that exist because Kearney is an inadequate facility for the purported purpose that it exists. What I think I'm going to have to do with the situation at Kearney is what I had to do all those years ago with the male prison--assume additional responsibility to put together some kind of proposal or plan to replace Kearney and have a facility that relates to the types of situations that exist in the year 2000 and onward, not dilapidated, ramshackled buildings not suitable for the purpose, not just some place for people to work who have been there for a long time and may not even understand what it takes to help rehabilitate children, and rehabilitation is a concept that is rapidly being abandoned by some politicians. Penologists still believe in rehabilitation. Penitentiary contains the notion of penitent--the person, being sorry about what has been done, making amends. Some people call it...I won't say restitution because that's what usually people use when they're talking about paying money, but they are atoning, in a sense, for what they did by having to serve that time, and the time of atonement should not be spent receiving punishment or being educated in ways of doing wrong which the penitent did
