nameless, speak no name and bear no blame, has expressed repeatedly a strong, principled opposition to the authorization of levying administrative penalties. Senator Bromm had such a bill and that was one of the objections raised by my esteemed colleague, not Senator Bromm. So, I'm not going to call that Senator's name, but I just want him to be alerted to the fact that in this bill, which was introduced at the request of the Governor, there is the levying of administrative fines. So keep in mind, brothers and sisters, that when we study in school, we pay attention, some of us, to what we learn, and in college, in literature, they actually have what are called morality plays that you are required to read and give reports on. In life, sometimes that term is applied to various activities that occur. This conflict between that person or this group and that group, reporters and pundits will say it's unfolding like a morality play, meaning there is a message in it that transcends the mere act itself. So, I just want my colleague to understand that I kind of see a morality play here, and it relates to the matter of loyalty, loyalty to principle or loyalty to governor. And I'm just going to observe how this morality play works out. It reminds me of an exchange that was occurring between Sir Thomas More and the Duke of Norfolk, who was his friend, trying to get Sir Thomas More to save his head by agreeing to let the King divorce his wife and marry somebody else, as men are prone to want to do, and some do that, you know, divorce one wife and marry another, that's common in these days, even if you hold the highest office in the state of Nebraska. But Sir Thomas More, as the Chancellor, was not going to tell anybody what his view was, so Norfolk said, Thomas, I'm your friend, you can tell me. And Sir Thomas said, no, I can't tell anybody, so the Duke continued to press him. So Sir Thomas finally said, if I tell you this, man, will it be kept strictly between you and me? The Duke said, certainly, Sir Thomas. Sir Thomas said, I have your word on that? Norfolk said, you have my word on it. Sir Thomas said, this is an ironclad secret between us. He said, yes, Sir Thomas. Sir Thomas looked at him, he said, suppose the King should call you and ask you, did you have this conversation with me? The Duke said, I would not say anything to the King, I would keep faith with you, Sir Thomas. And Sir Thomas said, what then becomes of your oath of loyalty to the King? And the Duke said, you catch me with your lawyer questions. I am not trying to catch anybody this morning. I just want to know where
