straight out sunset would say that this particular act, the Rural Economic Opportunities Act, would terminate on such and such a date. And I didn't know whether "without further authorization of the Legislature" was intended to mean something other than a new bill extending the provisions of this particular bill. My objective was to change the language slightly in the sunset provision in accordance with the amendment that's on your gadget, and it strikes the language "without further authorization of the Legislature", and simply says "there shall be no project applications approved on or after July 1, 2004", which is the date which is in the bill already. So it's seeking to make more definite and to clarify the sunset provision. We put a sunset provision, you may recall, in Senator Wehrbein's bill on economic development. And from my perspective I'm beginning to come very...to become very, very uneasy about all of the different types of "economic development" measures that we're passing in the Legislature. And I think it makes sense to put a sunset on every one of them and to, in the next couple of years, really take a look at our whole Department of Economic Development or our whole philosophy and rationale for putting state money into economic development of one type or another and see if we can't develop something a little more coherent. When the state first started getting into economic development, the rationale was, look, other states are giving incentives, so we have to give incentives to protect our...our economic base and to compete successfully with other states for business. So that economic conservative principle that basically we all started with, that says business should compete on its own and stand on its own two legs and rise or fall in accordance with economic principles, that went kind of by the side, because other states started giving incentives that upset the straight, Adam Smith, competitive idea of capitalism in the United States. So we departed from that principle. Since we departed from that principle to protect ourselves from other states, now we've started to depart from that principle for a variety of other reasons. And I think this particular session illustrates some of the problems that are starting to develop. For example, you have three different economic development bills before you that purport to deal with primarily rural areas, all of which are designed along new and different principles. And I think that the first thing we need to do this session is the folks who have these three different bills should
