transformed itself into $25 million, so that, in effect, about 84 cents on the dollar is what ended up as actual property tax relief, and I will point out, quite frankly, that there is another side to that issue, and I think that Senator Wehrbein will help explain that. Another point in that regard, I would...and I haven't heard anybody say at this point that we plan to extend the $30 million for a third year. So the point is that at some point community colleges, the additional $30 million per year state aid funding will go away, and at that point, community colleges will have to return to the system they used before this was in place, namely, their own property tax levies will go back up. I would submit to you that it is probably going to be easier to explain to your taxpayers why your property tax levy went back up after a one-year program than it is after two consecutive years. I think it's only going to make that more difficult. The second issue or the second main reason that I'm offering this to you is the idea of property tax relief. It's my notion that this needs to be part of a long-term plan, property tax relief does, and in particular, there needs to be serious consideration given to sustainability. If you look at it from the standpoint of a property taxpayer, certainly one of the issues is the less you pay the better, but I think another issue that deserves consideration is gyrations up and down over time. And if you offer up an amount for property tax relief that you can't sustain, you are, in effect, artificially lowering the property tax payment that a payer will have to make only to...for him to discover in a later year that he is going to have a sharp increase because you can't sustain it. And I would submit to you that given, at least if the person's memory is like mine, they'll probably not remember you decreasing property taxes nearly as well as they remember the increase that is bound to come later on. Another issue with property tax relief, I think one of the...one of the philosophies here has been that we need to do property tax relief if for no other reason than to get the money off the table. If we don't get the money off the table, it will end up in an A bill someplace, and we don't want that to happen, so lacking discipline we need, let's get the money away so something can't happen to it. Well, I guess I would suggest I have a little higher hopes for our general fiscal responsibility than that, and I really would, I think, rather than to defer to that motive, the motive of trying to develop
