support of this bill. Everything I've heard so far makes me even more supportive. It sounds like mostly what we're talking about here are arguments that protect the status quo and protect the system. The system we're talking about protecting is the Department of Health and Human Services. I think we've had some interesting dialogue about how that wonderful experiment, when the agencies were all consolidated, would function and how it would help, and we're worried about how much more money it might cost if the people that have this kind of a disability were able to help themselves more directly than they have been able to be helped by an agency. Are we worried...are we really worried right now about the sanctions that we're having to look forward to paying in HHS because we couldn't get our act together after spending fifty-some million dollars to organize some kind of a system for child support or anything else? Are these the same administrators that screwed that up pretty well or were incompetent to make the right decisions at the right time that's costing us all this money, the same administrators that you think should be in charge of this agency as well? I don't think so. I don't think it makes any sense. You know, if we were reorganizing the state and developing legislative districts and there is something called a division of interest, et cetera, consolidation of interests, whatever you want to call it, and we had enough folks who were blind, visually impaired, that we could put them into one area, they could elect somebody to represent themselves, that would be interesting, wouldn't it? Why do we think that somebody with a disability like this aren't capable of handling their own destiny? And because of the very unique circumstances that they find themselves involved with in life, they have to get together. They have to talk with each other, fight with each other, as the case might be, but, ultimately, they have to do what's right for each other. And the pennies we're talking about in comparison to how much money has been blown by the agency on data systems and the sanctions we're having to look forward to is nothing, is absolutely nothing compared to the independence that they would like to have now. It seems like what we're trying to do is to protect mother government and protect father agency or whatever else you want to call it. And maybe what we ought to be looking at, at this point in time, rather than...than worrying about dismantling a consolidated agency, which has not proven to be successful, if somebody can point out where we've saved money by
